Enforcing a Child Custody or Support Order. While in an ideal world parents would comply with any custody or support order regarding their child, that does not always occur. It can be frustrating to try to co-parent with a person who is unwilling to abide by the rules set forth by the court. Additionally, a refusal to comply with the obligations set forth in custody and support orders will likely create confusion and turmoil in the life of the child the orders are intended to protect.

Child support orders or agreements are often modified as well. If there is a change in the custody of a child, it may precipitate a request for a change in the support agreement or order, as the amount of time each parent is required to provide for the child will have changed. As a child grows the cost of caring for him or her may change, which is also grounds for modification.
