Understanding the persistent nature of gender inequality requires an examination of men and women, masculinity and femininity. Too often, when we talk of gender, we talk of women; when we think of race, we think of people of color. The dominant groups—those who hold most power in society, such as men and white people—often go unexamined and unanalyzed.

While many items in this test are related to gender roles, this test is not meant for measuring gender roles. For instance, compared to gender role tests, this test does not have a measure of assertiveness. The reason for this is that the gender difference in assertiveness is infinitesimal, so it is not a good measure of gender differences.
